

Once upon a time...

in a city of kings and dragons (allegedly), a man had a dream.

A dream of grandeur.

"On his nightstand lies a quill, and even though no elven blood courses his veins, he's not afraid to spill his own, to feed the quill and pray to God.

To Tir-Cendelius. The Poet.

*Though for a mere man an ill omen,
thoughts of more muddle acumen.*

*And so he pours his life onto the pages,
breathing soul both into the beauty,
and into the dangers.*

*Birthing worlds, gods and duty.
Killing worlds, gods and duty.*

*Until his veins dry out by the thousandth cut,
his mind deranged by the work of a god.*

*See,
a man was not made to rule over life.
And yet he tries.*

And dreams turn to nightmares. Yet grander."

I might not be down for a blood sacrifice, but I'd love to write for the countless fans of Larian's work all around the world.

It would be a dream come true, to use my penmanship, creativity and passion to the benefit of the next great game of one of my favourite studios in the whole wide world.

Warm regards,
Michał Kulijewicz